STRATEGY: Cooperating with proficient user of the new language

In reading and writing the target language, students often need to cooperate with proficient language users. This frequently happens when language learners encounter proficient language users on the job, in the classroom, or on a trip.

For instance, Sean needs to get help from Jean-Louis in order to understand some highly technical written instructions while on the job. Diana seeks advice from her Danish friends as she writes reports in Danish, Belinda cooperates with Germans, who help her understand tour book.
